THE KIDNAPED ADMIRAL *

When a distinguished aviator like Mr. Neely also possesses a fine gift as a fiction writer, his stories are sure to be distinctly worth while. This second adventure of "The Devil's Darning Needle" is even more exciting than "The Darning Needle Stings."

"Don't relan," he cautioned, "One nore leg will cover our semicircle. Chen, if we don't find her, we'll go lown closer."

Ten minutes later, he glanced casually over the water to the east. Something he saw there made him wrinking its brows in perpletity. Then he set he satomatic controls and pushed the dimiral away from the telescope. "Just a minute," he said. "I want to see semesthing."

Almost with the first turn of the hadwheel, he picked the object up. Insantly he reached for his wireless key and called the Albany. "There's the sammarine!" he cried. "She's on the surface, heading out of the tracks of the regular ships. Keep your eye on her."

There was a crash of furious impact, a shricking of metal against metal as the jagged ends of the smashed periscope acraped along the whole length of his armored bottom, a jolt that threw them forward in a smother of blinding spray as the collision hurled them downward upon the crest of a wave. Then again came the purring of a perfectly working motor as, freed of its restraint, it lifted them clear, and they soared upward in unimpeded flight.

they soared upward in unimpeded flight.

Admiral Begiey looked behind them as they climbed. Then he turned to Sayville, his eyes duncing with the delight of a schoolboy.

"Well, damn your impertinence!" he cried. "You've taught old Hugh Begley the list word in maval warfare. She's as helpless as a blind man. She has plugged up her periscope and is going down_to wait for night. Young man, you're an impedent wonder! But you haven't sot my torpedo bank yet. What are you going to do"

Sayville frowned in puzzled indecision.

"I don't know," he admirted slowly. "That is why I brought you along You must take command now. There is only one way to keep them from getting away when darkness comes. That is to blow them up. is such a sacrifice of human life—in cold blood—instiffable? Isn't there some other way."

It was the admiral's turn to frown in perplexity. He glamed over to the receiving set and ble? Isn't there some other way."

It was the admiral's turn to frown in perplexity. He glamed over to the submarine more accurately. "Now watch her closely," he directed. "The Albany is following this machine with her torpedo, ready to let fly. As soon as we are directly in line with the submarine. If I give the signal."

Sayville headed back and crossed again over the submarine. They could see her easily, a blurred mass of non-descript color silhowetted against the clear rays of refracted sunlight that illuminated the water under her and all about her. The aviator worked his wireless key rapidly as he flew. He paused in the midst of transmitting his orders.

"How deep do you indue she lat" he asked.

Why? Well, she is known as the "next Mary Pickford." She brims over with youth, gafety and vivacity. Her eyes, her line, her nose, her hands are alive every moment she is before the camera and all register.

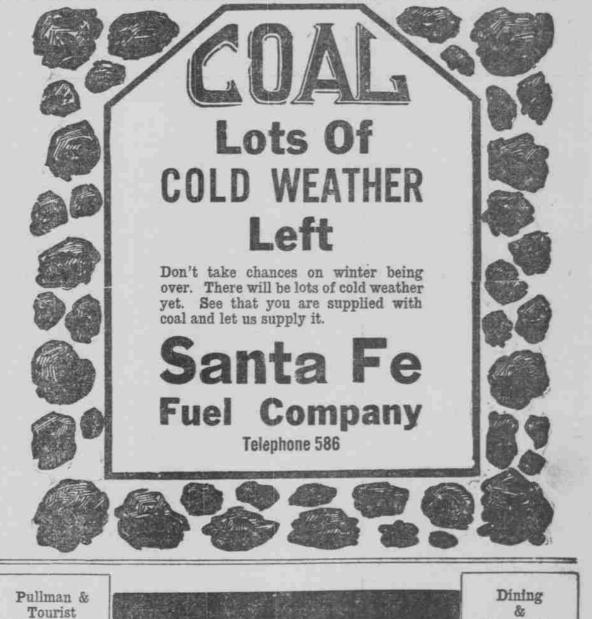

Perhans you have seen her in "Emmy of Stork's Next." Then you know why she gets $15,000 per annum.

Who says she is paid so large a sum? She does: and the Metro company admits it. Her mother indorses the statement as true—that "Miss Mary" number two has been advanced from $150 at the beninning of the season to the present enormous amount; and, furthermore that she has been offered as much for her services by rival movie concerns.
